Reading and Writing for Discovery and Transformation: Narrative Medicine as a Foundation for Undergraduate Medical Students

Delphine Taylor, MD is a general internist and Associate Professor of Medicine at Columbia University Vagelos College of Physicians and Surgeons. She is director of the longitudinal medical school course that focuses on developing skills and attitudes of becoming a physician, and integrates Narrative Medicine methods into weekly seminars in order to cultivate curiosity, embrace uncertainty, and explore self-knowledge. Dr. Taylor is co-creator of the Columbia Portfolio, the archive where students' written reflections are situated, and has published qualitative research on students' perception of the effect of the Portfolio. Most recently, she has introduced literary texts to explore racism, bias, equity and advocacy. She will describe the curriculum, demonstrate specific exercises, and encourage a discussion with participants.
